

All individuals were never, are never, and probably will never be born equal. By the course of nature and society, some were born with more privileges than others. Some had mountains of wealth by their side when they were born while others struggled to survive day to day. Some were born with supreme intelligence compared to others. Last but not least, some, just because of what they looked like and which family they were born into, were seen as supremely subordinate to others.

I envision an America which uses all of its ability to erase this invisible border which causes some to be more equal than others. Under the face of law and justice, the rich are equal to the poor, the subordinated is equal to the privileged, and the mentally challenged is made Einstein. The justice system of the nation I envision does not blindly judge its subjects based on the created sets of laws and illusion made by lawyers but rather based on the morals and ethics of rights and wrongs.

I envision the American people treating each other and foreigners as if all are related and all are a family. I imagine a nation where all can fully practice his or her unalienable rights as denoted in the Bill of Rights. Which means people judges each other not by colors, not by appearance, not by beliefs, not by affiliation with certain groups, but rather based on the actions which the judged one has done.

As said by Aristotle, a Greek philosopher: "The educated differ from the uneducated as much as the living from the dead" and then later on he further stated, "The one exclusive sign of thorough knowledge is the power of teaching". Also, as seen throughout history many times, civilizations that had literate and educated citizens were always better off than other civilizations of the same time in terms of knowledge and national stability. I envision the America that will walk in the same path. I envision the America that will prioritize education and will constantly update the knowledge base and educational system. I envision the American educational system which will transform every citizen from illiteracy to being educated regardless of the citizens' age, intelligence, wealth, or disability.

Last but not least, I imagine an American government that will spend more, study more, and encourage more for science. As said by Martin Luther King, Jr.: "Our scientific power has outrun our spiritual power. We have guided missiles and misguided men." We humans have taken the ability and power of science and nature for granted too many times, but more than often, in the end, we always somehow figure out a way to blame science and nature for the ramifications and consequences which we have unleashed upon our own species. For some reasons, humans are just exceptionally good at evading responsibility for his or her actions. Science and nature do not hurt humans. It is humans that hurts other human by exploiting science and nature. Because of this, I envision an America that will discover the deepest secrets hidden inside this adventure called Science, which will be used by Americans for the welfare of mankind rather than warfare against each other.
